

If I had no limits in one thing, just one thing, I would want to be perfect in archaeology. I love to discover things even if it's just a neat looking bottle cap or something.

I really don't like math, and you don't have to do much math. I love to travel everywhere so, you see, my digs might take me anywhere in the world.

I would find underground cities, bones, sunken things ect, ect. I would try to find sunken things alot because I like to go anywhere where there is half-clean water.

I love to go exploring in places I have never been before. Like go on paths, go through the woods and things like that.

And the last thing I like about archaeology is I love history and that is one of the main things it is about.

The money is also not bad. It pays energy to feed a few people and still some to spare. I would be making more than both my parents combined!

So what does this all lead to? I like everything to do with archaeology and one day I hope to be perfect.
